ABSTRACT

One embodiment of an inventive networking environment includes clients called sending clients because they send network content through a network, and clients called receiving clients because they receive the network content from the sending

5 clients through the network. Both sending clients and receiving clients are "clients" in that they rely on a management server to orchestrate the secure transfer of information from sending clients to receiving clients.